

ARIEL GRIFFIN

(MGPS '15) taught for seven years in private, charter and public schools in the Dominican Republic, México, Texas and Missouri. While teaching, she served on a district-wide committee for Socio-Emotional Learning (SEL) and the school site team for AVID - a national program committed to closing the achievement gap in education. Griffin's most memorable experience at LBJ was her internship summer when she served as a director of a summer school in the Dominican Republic through the DREAM Project – an experience that allowed her to see how policy affects program implementation. Prior to attending LBJ, she was a Fulbright scholar and also holds a second master's degree in education. Now, Griffin works as a Program Officer for Education at Children International in Kansas City which allows her to combine her policy education along with her practical experience in the classroom. In her free time, she works as an independent contractor for organizations that need Spanish-language training and as a consultant for local faith-based nonprofits.
